

The Native Baptist Church, the first Jamaican Afro-Christian movement was founded in 1783 by ex-slave, George Lisle. The American Methodist Society broke off from the Church of England in 1784 and called itself the Methodist Episcopal Church with Francis Asbury as its bishop. Methodists in Thirteen Colonies multiplied from 500 in 1771 to 15,000 in 1784, and then to 1,324,000 by 1850. The Second Great Awakening among Congregationalists and other New England churches began in 1792 and lasted for 30 years. Unitarians organized their own church in 1796. Widespread evangelistic camp meetings began in 1800 in America. The Kentucky Revival Awakenings had crowds of up to 25,000 and its meetings sweep through Kentucky, Tennessee and the Carolinas.

When Martin Luther created the new religion of Protestantism he introduced a religion the focus turned to that of individualism. Each person could find salvation, read the Bible, interpret the Bible and live a Christian life as they saw it. The great revivals of the 18th and 19th centuries were very successful and many new Protestant churches were formed. Protestant influence probably played a role in creating the image of rugged American individualism of its pioneers.

The newly created Protestant beliefs found a fertile seedbed in the American soil. The common man could study the Bible in his native language; the Holy Spirit would also reveal the true meanings directly to him. In addition, many local churches were self-governing and could choose their own pastors, teachers, elders, and deacons; most of whom had little or no formal education. When these were watered with the freedom of religion and speech new denominations and translations were created at a rate that could have never been imagined in Luther's wildest dreams.

What follows is the chronological order in which new denominations and translations came into being. Denominations are in bold type and translations are in regular type. Keep in mind that each new translation was someone's "Word of God."
